The positive side of the battery is connected to the controller and is carried through the entire train as one of the seven wires of the train line. The negative is connected on each car to the negative side of the magnet valves. This arrangement localizes the current demand from a battery to its own car. The use of a low voltage battery to operate the electromagnetic valves is one of the advantages of the system Fig. 92.--ELEMENTARY DIAGRAM OF CIRCUITS OF UNIT SWITCH CONTROL. obviating the necessity of running high voltage circuits through the train, and making the operation of the control independent of fluctuations of the line voltage. Car Connectors.--The connectors employed to establish the electrical connection between the cars in one train consist essentially of two sockets...
